Monologue

Future Me is incredible. Future Me wakes up early. Future Me exercises. Future Me studies. Future Me drinks enough water. Future Me somehow has their entire life together. I admire Future Me. In fact, I trust Future Me so much that I constantly give them responsibilities. "Future Me will finish the assignment." "Future Me will start the business." "Future Me will finally organize the room." Current Me is more of a manager. A visionary. I create plans. Future Me executes them. The only problem is that eventually Future Me becomes Present Me. And Present Me immediately starts assigning everything to an even newer Future Me. It's an endless cycle of delegation. At this point I'm basically running a company where nobody actually works and every deadline gets passed to another version of myself. I spend more time planning productivity than actually being productive. I've got schedules, calendars, reminders, motivational quotes, and color-coded systems. None of them work. But they look impressive. And somehow, despite all the evidence, I still believe Future Me will save everything. That's leadership. Questionable leadership. .But leadership.
