Someone describes their daily battle against waking up on time.

Monologue

Every night I become a completely different person. A disciplined person. A motivated person. A person who says, "Tomorrow I'm waking up at 5 AM." Nighttime Me is ambitious. Nighttime Me believes anything is possible. Nighttime Me watches productivity videos and starts making plans like a CEO preparing for a billion-dollar merger. Then 5 AM arrives. And I meet Morning Me. Morning Me has very different opinions. Morning Me thinks sleep is important. Morning Me thinks alarms are aggressive. Morning Me believes any plan made after 9 PM should be reviewed by legal professionals before implementation. Every morning begins with negotiation. "Just five more minutes." Five minutes becomes ten. Ten becomes thirty. Thirty becomes a complete lifestyle. I've hit snooze so many times that my alarm clock probably feels personally rejected, at this point my alarm clock and I aren't friends anymore. We're rivals. Every day it tries to wake me up. Every day I try to silence it.

And somehow we're both losing.
