Scene Description

Someone realizes they've been paying for a gym membership they barely use.

Monologue

At this point, I'm not a gym member. I'm a sponsor. Every month I donate money to a facility I barely visit. The gym has received more commitment from my bank account than from my actual body.

The employees see me so rarely that when I walk in they introduce themselves. One guy asked if it was my first time there. I've been paying for three years.

I go through motivational phases. I'll wake up one morning convinced my transformation begins today. I'll buy healthy food. Watch fitness videos. Stretch dramatically in front of a mirror.

Then I get to the gym, spend twelve minutes on a treadmill, and leave feeling like I've completed military training.

After that I disappear for another three weeks.

At this point I'm pretty sure the equipment talks about me when I'm gone. "Hey, remember that guy? The one who arrives full of hope and leaves after one exercise?" That's me. The gym's favorite recurring guest star.
