A retail employee shares unbelievable customer experiences.

Monologue

A customer once asked me if batteries came included. I said yes. They nodded and asked, "Electricity too?" I froze. Not because I didn't hear them. Because I did. And I needed a moment to process what had just entered my brain. Working retail teaches you many things: patience, communication, emotional endurance, and the shocking realization that logic is apparently optional. Another customer asked if Wi-Fi would still work without internet. I explained that Wi-Fi and internet are connected. They looked disappointed, like I personally invented the laws of technology to inconvenience them.

Then there was the customer who spent ten minutes arguing with a price tag. Not me. Not the manager. The price tag. They genuinely believed if they stared at it long enough, it would negotiate. I've had customers ask where the exit was while standing next to a giant sign labeled "EXIT." One guy asked if a product would fit in his car. I asked what kind of car he had. He said, "I don't know." At some point I realized I'm not working customer service anymore. I'm providing emotional support for confusion.

And honestly, some days confusion wins.
