Scene Description

A person becomes convinced they're an expert after watching a few online tutorials.

Monologue

I watched three videos. Three. And suddenly I felt qualified. Not just informed. Qualified. I was ready to fix things, teach people, and offer advice. The tutorials made everything look easy. The instructor was calm, confident, smiling, and clearly had their life together. Meanwhile, I was one mistake away from creating a small disaster.

But confidence is dangerous. After the third video I started saying things like, "How hard can it be?" Those words should honestly trigger a warning siren. Because every single time I've said them, something expensive has suffered. I followed the instructions carefully. Then less carefully. Then not at all. Eventually I was just improvising. At one point I wasn't fixing the problem anymore—I was creating entirely new problems. The tutorial was ten minutes long. My repair attempt lasted four hours and somehow made everything worse. That's when I learned an important lesson. Watching someone do something successfully is not the same as being able to do it yourself.

The internet gave me knowledge. Reality gave me consequences.
