Monologue

The Wi-Fi went down. No warning. No explanation. Just gone. I stood there holding my phone, refreshing the page over and over like determination alone could bring the signal back. Nothing. For fifteen minutes I was forced to experience something horrifying: reality. I looked around my room. Actually looked around. There were objects in there I'd apparently never noticed before. I considered reading a book. A physical book. The fact that this even crossed my mind tells you how desperate things had become. I started pacing. Checking the router. Standing closer to the router. As if proximity somehow creates internet.

Then came the dramatic phase. I began acting like civilization itself was collapsing. No videos. No social media. No endless scrolling. Just me and my thoughts. A truly dangerous combination. I even tried having a productive moment, which felt unnatural and vaguely threatening. Then, finally, the Wi-Fi returned. The signal bars appeared. Life had meaning again. I didn't celebrate. I simply nodded, like two old friends who had survived a difficult chapter together.

And then I immediately went back online as if none of this had happened..
