Scene Description

A person recounts a first date that went spectacularly wrong.

Monologue

Everything was going perfectly. The kind of perfect where you start thinking, "Wow... I might actually be good at this dating thing." We were laughing, the conversation was flowing, and for the first time in my life I felt smooth. Then I called her by my cousin's name. Which would've been embarrassing enough. Except my cousin is a guy.

The entire table went silent. Not normal silence. The kind of silence where you can hear your future collapsing. So naturally, I tried to fix it. Bad decision.

I immediately said, "No, no, no, different cousin." Which somehow made things worse because now it sounded like I had multiple cousins creating problems in my dating life.

She stared at me. I stared at my drink. The waiter arrived at the worst possible moment and asked if we were celebrating anything special. Without thinking, I said, "Surviving this conversation."

I laughed. Nobody else did.

The date ended shortly after that. We never spoke again. But years from now, long after I've forgotten everything else, I'll still remember the exact moment I watched a successful first date launch itself off a cliff.
