Monologue

You know what's strange? I keep looking at that chair. That one. The one by the window. Nobody sits there anymore. Nobody has for months, but every morning I still glance over and expect to see you. I know you're gone. I'm not confused. I'm not pretending. It's just... Some habits don't know how to die. I still hear your laugh sometimes. Not really hear it, more like remember it so clearly that it feels real.

I remember how you'd tell the same story over and over. And I'd roll my eyes. And you'd laugh. And now I'd give anything... Anything... To hear that story one more time. You know what hurts the most? Not the big moments. Not the hospital. Not the goodbye. It's the little things. The ordinary things. The things I never thought to appreciate because I thought they'd always be there, I thought you'd always be there. And now every time I see that chair...

I remember how wrong I was.
